

Editorial

You must have noticed that the Journal has further improved since the last issue in its quality. Thanks to the generous help of the Scientific Adviser to Raksha Mantri, and our Advertisers, the financial position has improved and has encouraged us to go in for better quality paper and printing.

'Aviation Medicine' is a journal for all members of our Society and it should reflect their views and opinions. We have attempted to keep this aim in mind all the time. The articles published are wide ranging in the scope and speciality. Yet most of the contributions are received from our members working in large research and clinical establishments. We have been very keen to publish articles by our members in the field units, but the response has not been very encouraging. Observations and experiences in the field form an important aspect of Aviation Medicine. We look forward to receiving more articles from the members in the peripheral establishments.

From the next issue onwards we are planning to start a new section in the journal—Letters to the Editor. Your cooperation is most essential in the successful functioning of this section. We would like to publish views and findings of members engaged in field work, in the form of letters to the Editor even if they are not in the form of full fledged Scientific articles. Suggestions to improve the utility of the Journal are most welcome.
